State Sen. Kimberly Lighford (D-Broadview) and State Rep. Sara Feigenholtz (D-Chicago) both voted against the measure to override Gov. Pat Quinn's amendatory veto of new concealed carry regulations in Illinois.

The Senate on Tuesday voted 41-17 to override after the House of Representatives voted 77-31. The support of 36 senators and 71 representatives was needed for the General Assembly to successfully override Quinn's veto, according to the Chicago Tribune.

Without Quinn's amendments, which are seen as more restrictive for gun owners, the Illinois concealed carry regulations that were originally passed in May would require gun owners to have a concealed carry license issued by the Illinois State Police, the Tribune reports. That license would cost $150 every five years.

License applicants would be required to complete 16 hours of training on the range and in the classroom.

Illinois will be the last state to legalize concealed carry. A federal court mandated that such regulations be passed by Tuesday, according to the Tribune.

In their action Tuesday, the Senate did add a few minor changes supported by Quinn to the original bill sent to the governor, the Tribune reports. The House will need to approve those changes before the law is official.
